Biomechanics involves the study of the interactions of physical forces with biological systems. The emerging concept of mechanobiology focuses on the way that cells produce and respond to mechanical forces – bridging the science of mechanics with the disciplines of genetics and molecular biology. The theme of this conference is the linking of disparate spatial and temporal scales using experimentation, computing and visualization for the purpose of investigating some of the most intriguing problems underlying these two disciplines. Discussions will relate to state-of-the-art research in computational sciences, experimental procedures and visualization approaches that investigate phenomena in Biomechanics and Mechanobiology through a multiscale perspective or provide efficient, coarse-grained description at the same scale. Emphasis will be placed on novel techniques in computing, experimentation and visualization, multidisciplinary research approaches that demonstrate successful synergies as well as experimental and visualization techniques that motivate and support the computational models.
